The AAF's postwar planning activities were coordinated by two men. Col Reuben Moffat, an enlisted aviator in WWI and a graduate of the Air Corps Tactical School (ACTS), ran the AAF's PWD. An injury early in WWII grounded him from flying, but his war experience made him a prime candidate to be a lead military planner. His staff consisted of individuals with no operational experience due to the unattractive nature of planning for postwar activities in the midst of a global war. Colonel Moffat worked for Maj Gen Laurence Kuter, the Assistant Chief of Air Staff Plans. Major General Kuter and Colonel Moffat became the primary military leaders outside General Arnold responsible for the majority of the AAF postwar planning.

Colonel Moffat thought all aircraft belonged in the United States Air Force (USAF), not the Navy or Marine Corps, and therefore the other services would only play defensive roles in future wars, justifying an extremely large air force. Ultimately, this plan was not based on detailed postwar international contingencies; 105 groups was just a large number supported by a fair amount of high-level War Department officials, and that seemed to provide forces for the AAF to remain powerful 'enough'. The planners completed the final version of the 105-group plan on February 14, 1944

On May 23, 1944, General Kuter asked Colonel Moffat to construct a second plan assuming that an effective international peacekeeping force would exist after the end of the war, allowing for a smaller USAF.

In a memorandum to General Marshall, Colonel Moffat explained the AAF could not support his plan for such a small air force, and could not support his Universal Military Training program. Colonel Moffat claimed the military should stop self-imposed limitations on troop numbers and budgets. He further argued the Army should fight against the Navy continually receiving 50% of the defense budget; it was time for the AAF and by default the War Department to get a larger share. If General Marshall really believed in airpower, Colonel Moffat felt the Army had to stop capitulating on the budget to the Navy.
